In comic books, Native American superheroes are similar. They have special powers and talk to animals. They wear a headdress or a loincloth.

Jeffrey Veregge is in the Port Gamble S'Klallam tribe. It is in Washington state. He is an artist who draws for comic books. He said earlier artists did not learn much about Native Americans.

"They were just going off of TV and film," he said. He said that other heroes had costumes. Native people were not shown well, though.

Veregge grew up reading comic books on his tribe's land. It is near Seattle, Washington. Now, he is "living a dream." He is leading a Marvel comic book about Native stories.

Showing Native Heroes In A New Way

Marvel Comics said in August that it has gathered Native artists and writers for a new book. It is called "Marvel Voices: Indigenous Voices #1." The book will have Native characters. It will come out during Native American History Month in November.

Native comic book fans hope it changes things. They want to see Native heroes in a new way.

Veregge has drawn more than 100 covers for comic books. So he was a good person to lead the new book.

Lee Francis IV owns the Red Planet Books & Comics store. It is in New Mexico. He prints Native comics. His family comes from the Laguna Pueblo. That is Native land in New Mexico. Francis helped find Native artists for the new book.

Racist Stereotypes In Comic Books

Racist stereotypes are in comic books, Francis said. It is because the artists used ideas from TV, he said. Stereotypes are general ways of looking at people or their races. Someone might have a wrong idea about all people of a race.

Dezbah Evans likes Marvel's "X-Men." It is about young characters having trouble with their powers. They are treated badly. That seems like how America treats Native communities, she said. She is a comic book fan from Oklahoma. She is in the Navajo, Chippewa and Yuchi tribes.

Evans is looking forward to the new book. It will have one of her favorite characters, Danielle Moonstar.

Evans hopes comic books keep expanding. They could have Native moms as heroes, she said.

Telling Kids: "You Can Do This, Too"

Veregge sometimes meets children on the reservation where he grew up. Their parents talk about his work for Marvel. He likes these meetings.

"I get to tell kids: 'I grew up on this reservation, too. You can do this, too,'" Veregge said.
